

Acknowledgments

Even if this project started on a whim, it was no improvisation! It is the fruit of research carried out over several years, and acknowledging all the help and support received along the way is no easy task.

I carried out research for this book concomitantly with my work on Italian salons and salonnières, of which it is an offshoot. A National Endowment for the Humanities (NEH) fellowship, a sabbatical from Florida State University, a Visiting Scholar appointment at the Università Ca' Foscari Venezia, funding from the FSU Council on Research and Creativity, and a period in the Visiting Artists and Scholars Program at the American Academy in Rome all helped, in various ways, to tie the parts of this work together.

Vernon Hyde Minor was instrumental in turning my gaze to the quirkiness of Arcadia, and to Veronese in particular, when I attended his Summer NEH Seminar on the Baroque at the American Academy in Rome in 2011. To him and the wonderful, interdisciplinary group of colleagues I met there, I owe infinite gratitude. That summer, we indeed recreated our own Arcadia on the slope of Rome's Janiculum Hill, in the immediate vicinity of the Parrhasian Grove.

For all things Venetian, and for her unbounded intellectual and personal generosity, I owe a great debt of gratitude to my friend and mentor, Daria Perocco. A warm thank you also to all of my students who, over the years, contributed their fresh insights on Veronese's autobiography and social networking agenda while taking my courses on eighteenth-century women's writing and sociability.

I can't say how lucky I am to have found in Adrienne Ward the most perfect partner in crime: passionate, generous, detailed, relentless, and so much fun to work with. I hope we will go on committing many more literary crimes together!

Finally, an immense thank you to mom. And to my greatest supporter and the love of my life, Tom, who every time I announced we were finished with the manuscript (many times!) would say, "I'll believe it when I see it!" Tom, I hope you can now believe it.

I would like first to thank the Gladys Kriebel Delmas Foundation for their generosity in funding both initial research in Venice and the publication of this book. I am also grateful to the University of Virginia and the Department of Spanish, Italian, and Portuguese for granting me research leave, including sabbatical time supported by the University of Virginia Sesquicentennial Associateship program. Their support has been essential to my progress on this project.

I am truly grateful for my friend and colleague Irene Zanini-Cordi, who kindly invited me to co-author this work. Without Irene I would not have known about Veronese, a writer who hails from her own home turf, making the project even more gratifying! Irene was familiar with many of the locations Veronese identifies and the literary figures closely associated with those places. Our collaboration has been a gift on many fronts: the joys of bilingual translation, debating meaning and pinning down the right term, the thrill of the hunt for a particular citation or edition, and the companionship when the going got tedious or we faced unexpected challenges. The experience of sharing the workload has been a game changer. I have learned a great deal about early nineteenth-century Italian poetry, but the biggest and best lesson has been about the benefits of doing scholarship in due – and with a partner as intelligent, generous, flexible, and creative as Irene.

Lastly, I thank my husband, John O'Connell, who has tolerantly lived with the books, the papers, and the equally enormous quantities of time and focus this project has required. His love, support, and good humour throughout have been my rock.

Together we are grateful for the able assistance of library staff from a number of institutions: in Italy, the Biblioteca Marciana, the Museo Correr Library, the Ateneo Veneto, the Biblioteca Nazionale Centrale di Firenze, the Biblioteca Statale di Lucca, the Biblioteca Statale Isontina di Gorizia, the National Library of Austria, and the Biblioteca Civica Bertoliana in Vicenza; in the United States, the Cooper Hewitt Library, the Florida State University Library, and the University of Virginia Library.

Dr. Giovanna Rak, at the Accademia dell'Arcadia in Rome, assisted us with valuable information.

We extend many thanks to colleagues who have kindly discussed the work with us, who have heard or read versions of it, and whose insights have decidedly improved our study: Tatiana Crivelli, Susan Dalton, Clorinda Donato, Sabrina Ferri, Paola Giuli, Rebecca Messbarger, Mark Pietralunga, Catherine Sama, Francesca Savoia, and Rachel Walsh. We especially thank our anonymous readers for their perceptive comments and dedication to bettering our work, and Dariella Fonseca, who contributed her skills and time to transcribing both texts. At the University of Toronto Press we wish to thank our editor Mark Thompson, our diligent copyeditor Barbie Halaby, and our congenial and generous managing editor Barbara Porter.
