

ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

I first thank God that I was healthy during the pandemic and able to write this book. This project began in 2018 and required travel to three Brazilian cities and to North Carolina with my then four-year-old daughter. While I was working, I also homeschooled and traveled monthly, sometimes twice a month, to visit my beautiful grandmother Gladys H. Mitchell, who was sick. She passed away in 2019, but I am forever grateful for her unconditional love, wisdom, and all the care she dedicated to me and our family. When the pandemic began, I was already three years into homeschooling and had learned to balance work, family, and my volunteer service. The homeschooling journey had already taught me to appreciate every day, every moment, and sometimes every second.

This book benefited from the help of many people: research assistants, contacts at field research sites who allowed me to conduct research at their workplaces, and all those who allowed me and my team to interview them. Unfortunately, one respondent in São Paulo passed away due to Covid-19. I am grateful to the following research assistants: Bria Brown, Crystal Ellis, Sha-vonte Grant, Lester Kern, Mariah Levy, Paulo Victor Pacheco, Dalila Negreiros, Rebecca Sobral, and Nia Wilson. I also thank Tchernavia Montgomery, Holly Kaster, Damaris Wright, and Lanetta Williams for allowing my research team to conduct interviews with women at their worksites. I thank Fernanda Barros dos Santos, Paulo Victor Pacheco, Dalila Negreiros, and Sales Santos who aided with transcriptions. I am also grateful to Michel Chagas and Ecylla Borges for graciously sharing their beautiful home in Salvador. I am grateful to all the women who participated in this study and gave the interview team time taken from their busy schedules to interview them. I also thank those who funded the project. This research was funded by the University of Wisconsin–Milwaukee’s Research Grant Initiative, and I was able to present preliminary research with funding from UWM’s Center for Latin American and Caribbean Studies.

My involvement with the U.S. Network for Democracy in Brazil and the Washington Brazil Office has been a wonderful experience and made the time writing this book during a pandemic bearable. I am grateful to all those I have worked with who are committed to democracy and marginalized communities in Brazil: James Green, Dalila Negreiros, Anielle Franco, Marcelle Decothé, Douglas Belchior, Kia Caldwell, Sharelle Barber, Gregory “Duff” Morton, Sidney Chaloub, Juliana Morães, Iman Musa, Natalia Campos, Myriam Marques, and Paulo Abrão. A luta continua!

I am extremely grateful to my daughter Truth Walthour, who accompanied me when I conducted interviews and when I attended my research assistants’ interviews. She made the best of each situation. She is an empathetic and nonjudgmental child who was always open to friendship and play with the children she met in Brazil and the United States. I also thank my husband Anthony Walthour, who ensured I had time to write this book. Sunday Daddy-Daughter dates were wonderful opportunities for me to slip away to a local coffee shop to work. I also thank my sisters Cornelia Smith, Davia Lee, and Julia Elam, who have always been supportive. I am also thankful for my prayerful Godmother Elnora Barrier, and I am grateful for my mother, Violet Mitchell who is always helping someone. Like the Black women in this book who serve as caretakers for family members, I thank my cousin Phyllis Lynch for caring for my grandmother so she could remain comfortably in her home as she desired. I thank her sister, Julia Morris, who always provided a positive and loving word to my grandmother. My grandmother passed away during the writing of this book but would be proud to know I completed another book. I also acknowledge the passing of my father-in-law, John E. Walthour, during the writing of this book; he was a kind and humorous person. Finally, I thank my ancestors who poured into me and who taught me humility, commitment to family and the Black community, and social justice: my father David Mitchell Jr. and my grandmother Gladys H. Mitchell.

THE POLITICS OF SURVIVAL

